

What Are the Benefits of Veteran-Owned Certification?

Why should military veterans consider getting their business certified as a veteran-owned company? This special certification opens doors to contracts worth billions of dollars each year. The Federal Contracting Center, a SAM government contracting consultant, helps businesses navigate the veteran owned small business certification process to unlock these opportunities.

Getting certified as a veteran-owned business gives you access to set-aside contracts. These contracts are reserved just for veteran-owned companies. The government wants to support veterans who start businesses. They set aside money specifically for veteran-owned firms.

You get a competitive edge over other businesses. When agencies need services, they look for veteran-owned companies first. This gives you a big advantage. You face less competition because fewer businesses can bid on these contracts.

The certification also boosts your credibility. Customers trust veteran-owned businesses more. They know veterans have discipline and strong work ethics. This trust can lead to more contracts and partnerships.

Your business becomes visible in government databases. Agencies search these databases when they need contractors. Being listed means more agencies will find your company. This increases your chances of winning contracts.

You can team up with larger contractors, too. Big companies need veteran-owned partners to meet diversity goals. They actively seek certified veteran businesses. These partnerships can lead to steady work and growth.

The process also helps you understand your business better. You must organize financial records and business documents. This exercise reveals strengths and weaknesses. You end up with a clearer picture of your company.

Certification lasts for three years. Once approved, you can bid on veteran set-aside contracts immediately. The government tracks your certification status automatically. You just need to renew when it expires.

Getting veteran-owned certification can transform your business. It opens new markets and creates lasting partnerships. Your military service becomes a business advantage that generates real revenue.
